Dear Dan,

The Warren is a good example of a small country house in the domestic revival style. The survival of The Warren, in a form very similar to its early twentieth century appearance does mean it should be considered a non-designated heritage asset. The retention of a significant amount of land associated with the house at the time of its construction is beneficial in maintaining an understanding and appreciation of its historic interest. I support an approach to find ways to enable the house and its estate land to stay intact as a single unit without excessive development.

The current proposals to financially enable and support a continuation of the estate as a coherent land holding are agreeable in principle in heritage terms.

Regards,
Seán
