2 large Oaks, 1 of which (red boarder) has shed limbs on 3 occasions in close succession, a matter of a couple of weeks. I believe there is substantial danger to life as the trees are located on a fairly active access road to garages for multiple homes with a cut through path situated directly under the crowns.

Crowns are also spreads over 3 gardens, adding to the potential risks.

Although no limbs have failed from the adjacent Oak. Would be treating them as a single crown due to their close proximity to one another
