Comments:	Horsham is crying out for a place on the cultural map. Ever since the Guggenheim landed in Bilbao, art has demonstrated the instrumental role it can play in raising the profile of a place (and all the benefits to tourism, the economy, etc. that this engenders). Shelley's influence is not just felt in Britain, but so too globally, and the district needs to reclaim one of its most famous residents as an intangible part of its own cultural heritage. As a curator and editor of visual arts, working internationally, I highly commend the design of this monument for its direct representation, yet sensitivity to the natural environment in which it will sit. It's fantastic to see the community organising in such a way so as to commission this work and hope that it will continue to inspire residents of the town, and those from further afield, for generations to come.

Kind regards
